Tree Peonies

The misnomer "Tree" peony was probably applied to indicate the woody structure of the stems, as compared with the herbaceous peony which dies to the ground each winter. Actually, the original species and all related varieties are shrubs with woody branches originating at or near the ground—similar to any other shrub. Rarely will any tree peony specimen exceed five feet in height at maturity. The rough woody stems or branches are rather thick and irregular without twiggy side growths, presenting in winter a somewhat "Japanesque" or gnarled appearance. As the shrub grows it increases in beauty and value. It is not exceptional to see as many as 100 magnificent fragrant flowers on one large specimen. These hardy tree peonies live to a great age—they were highly prized and effectively used by the Chinese more than a thousand years ago. But centuries passed before its introduction to the western world. Then, in order to perpetuate varieties, it was found necessary to graft, a slow and difficult process, in the course of which a high percentage of loss was experienced. This apparently discouraged commercial growing for still another century, but the inherent beauty of this lovely flower could not long be confined to a few. A steady growing demand encouraged greater effort in exploration and research, until today the colors range from the purest white, through yellow to rich velvety maroon.

The growing interest in tree peonies here, is due in no small measure to the consistent research and first hand knowledge of Professor John C. Wister, to whom grateful acknowledgment is made for his helpful suggestions.

Great progress was made in Europe by hybridizing the original Chinese species to produce what is now known as the EUROPEAN TREE PEONY generally having double flowers somewhat similar to a glorified herbaceous peony.

On the other side of the world, the Japanese were working with a Chinese type, which resulted in the distinct and beautiful JAPANESE TREE PEONY. Typical of this class are the huge wavy crinkled petals, possessing a translucent quality that might suggest some giant ethereal butterfly. The golden powder puff of anthers and finely divided foliage are also distinctive.

In comparatively recent years the LUTEA HYBRIDS were developed by using the Chinese yellow peony shrub as a parent in breeding, to introduce an entirely new and exciting color range in the yellow and bicolor class. To Professor A. P. Saunders, more than any other one man, we are indebted for the marvellous varieties in this group. Large plants of this type are still exceptionally scarce, and being rather difficult to propagate, it is probable the supply of Lutea hybrids will lag far behind demand, for many a decade.

All three types are individually beautiful, and for such an unusual shrub there are many locations where the thrilling beauty of the flowers can be seen to advantage. A background of conifers or broadleaf evergreens form an ideal foil against which the delicately fashioned petals are etched. A hedge of tree peonies in full bloom is beyond description, and even specimen spot plants in a garden, formal or otherwise, cannot help but add richness to the whole picture. The flowers begin to open about the second week in May and continue for three to four weeks. For permanent planting they should be placed not less than four feet apart if they are to be allowed to develop naturally into a shapely shrub. While full sunlight is desirable, some broken shade during the hottest part of the day, is an advantage, but they should not be exposed to high winds nor compete with tree roots. The plants are perfectly hardy, but the flowers benefit from the little shelter.

As to soil, it seems tree peonies thrive in almost any well drained garden soil that is about neutral in reaction. Autumn planting is generally preferred as the plants are dormant and the soil is warm and friable, inducing quick establishment in the new surroundings. However it is advisable to mulch the ground, after it has frozen, with about three inches of leaves peatmoss, old straw or similar material to prevent heaving. In northern sections some growers "hill up" their plants as is practiced with roses. In spring, planting should be done early, as soon as the soil can be worked, and all plants should be kept moist during summer. An annual application of bone meal or phosphate-potash fertilizer is helpful after the plants are established. The only pruning needed is the removal of dead branches, by cleanly cutting back to sound wood, preferably to a good healthy bud or side growth. To prevent possible entrance of disease spores, it is well to paint the wound with bordeaux paste. Generally speaking, tree peonies need no more care than is accorded any choice shrub.

As Japanese Tree Peonies become more widely known, the demand increases far in excess of the still limited supply.

Mixed Varieties

In the course of growing operations, some labels are occasionally lost, which results in our having a limited number of plants that cannot be named until they flower. We offer them at a greatly reduced rate. All good varieties.

Assorted unnamed varieties, 2 to 3 years.....	5.00
Assorted unnamed varieties, 4 to 6 years.....	10.00

As Japanese Tree Peonies become more widely known, the demand increases far in excess of the still limited supply.

THIS LIST REPRESENTS THE MOST COMPLETE COLLECTION EVER OFFERED IN THIS COUNTRY but it is probable some varieties may be sold out during the season so we suggest that you specify a second choice on your order, or give us permission to select others for you, which we shall do unless otherwise instructed.

European Varieties

Altho quite similar in the color range, to the Japanese varieties, the flowers in this group are generally quite double, with rather heavier petals, resembling a glorified herbaceous peony. They flower about the same time as Japanese.

Prices are for strong 2 to 3 year plants.
